The Dove and the Ant

attributed to Mother Goose

An ant went to the river to drink and fell in. He was carried along in the current. A dove pitied the ant and threw a branch into the river. The ant climbed onto the branch and soon reached the shore. Soon after that the ant spied a hunter with a gun aimed at the dove. The ant quickly stung him on the foot. This caused the man to lose his aim, and he missed this dove. Thus, the ant saved the dove's life. One good deed deserves another.

The Boy Who Cried Wolf

attributed to Aesop

Long ago a boy watched over the village's sheep on a nearby hillside. One day he became lonely. He remembered that if saw a wolf, he could call out, and help would come. The boy had not seen a wolf, but still he cried out. The villagers heard him and rushed up to the pasture. There was no wolf! They warned the boy never to call out falsely again.

For a long time he did not, but one day, feeling lonely again, he cried out loudly. Again the villagers rushed to help him. Again they found only the sheep and the boy. Again they were upset at having been fooled. After they warned him not to call out unless he really saw a wolf, they returned to their work.

A few days later the boy spotted a big gray wolf creeping out of the forest. The boy called with all his might. The villagers below heard his cries but went on with their work. They would not be fooled again. They heard the boy's cry suddenly stop, and it was silent. Startled, the villagers rushed to the pasture. The wolf was gone and so was the boy.

The Ants and the Grasshoppers

attributed to Aesop

It was fall, and the ants were busy storing food for the winter. The grasshoppers, however, did not want to bother with such work. They played every day and would not listen when the ants warned them that winter was coming.

“We have plenty of time,” they said. But before they knew it, winter came with cold winds, snow, and ice. There was no food to be found anywhere.

The grasshoppers went to the door of the ants and said, “Please, dear friends, won’t you share your food with us?” The ants did not hear them. They had gone deep into the earth to keep warm for the winter.

The Crow and the Peacocks

attributed to Aesop

One day a crow was flying over the king's palace. She looked down into the garden and saw a flock of peacocks with their pretty feathers spread out behind them.

“My plain black feathers are so ugly,” she said.

Swiftly she swooped down and picked up as many stray feathers as she could find. She attached them to her tail. Dressed in her borrowed feathers, the crow went into the garden with the peacocks. They saw right away that she was an imposter and not at all like them.

“How funny you look,” they laughed. Then they pecked at her borrowed feathers until she flew away.

Peacocks

Peacocks are known for their brightly colored blue and green feathers. They can spread their tail into a fan. The male peacock is one of the most beautiful birds in the world.
